There are moments in the history of design when something is born that is not just a product but a symbol. It is at these moments that design becomes not just a function but a statement, not just a means to an end but an end in itself. It is at these moments that design becomes not just a craft but an art, not just a profession but a vocation. It is at these moments that design becomes not just a job but a calling, not just a career but a life. It is at these moments that design becomes not just a way of life but a way of thinking, not just a way of seeing but a way of being. It is at these moments that design becomes not just a way of doing things but a way of making things, not just a way of solving problems but a way of creating beauty. It is at these moments that design becomes not just a way of improving things but a way of transforming things, not just a way of making things better but a way of making things new. It is at these moments that design becomes not just a way of changing things but a way of creating things, not just a way of making things different but a way of making things extraordinary. It is at these moments that design becomes not just a way of making things useful but a way of making things meaningful, not just a way of making things work but a way of making things matter. It is at these moments that design becomes not just a way of making things last but a way of making things live, not just a way of making things endure but a way of making things thrive. It is at these moments that design becomes not just a way of making things good but a way of making things great, not just a way of making things beautiful but a way of making things beautiful to the soul.
